The Quarantine Mind

A harmless name, they said—
yet it enters like a key made of rust.
My nose becomes a broken altar,
breath sacrificed to something unseen.

Inside my head, an unfinished skyscraper sways,
every floor a thought buckling under weight.

Windows blink like anxious eyes.
The cold is a locksmith—
it frees the other tenant in me,
the one who speaks in echoes
and trusts shadows more than light.

Fever turns blood into sirens.
Sleep is a sealed room with no handle.

Fever hums philosophies,
sleep fractures into watchfulness.
I am ill, yes—
but also divided,
learning how fragile the mind becomes
when the body forgets peace.

- Aristo